Biology of Language: The Epistemology of Reality Humberto R. Maturana (1978) I am not a linguist, I am a biologist. Therefore, I shall speak about language as a biologist, and address myself to two basic biological questions, namely: 1. What processes must take place in an organism for it to establish a linguistic domain with another organism? 2.

competence for emotional body language. Communication signals used by higher organisms come in many shapes and forms and involve all sensory modalities. Among all these signals actions involving the whole body and expressing emotion (emotional body language, or EBL for short) by their saliency and frequency occupy a privileged position in many species.

In a recent review article in this journal, Everett (2005) finds our book Anderson & Lightfoot (2002) (as well as Givón 2002) seriously lacking and unpersuasive in the case it attempts to make for the importance of an understanding of the human language faculty as an aspect of our species' biology.
